gerous chemicals.

- Charlie created as many compounds as her two neighbors combined.
- The set of chemists with workbenches to the left of Desmond is exactly the set of chemists whose names come before his alphabetically.
- Fantine thought it was pretty cool that the number of compounds she created was the average of the numbers created by her neighbors, until Gustavo pointed out that the same applied to him.

fries. Anyway, blue-shift all of the letters in ROYGBIV.

You see a description of this type of puzzle, from your piece to Michelangelo's, but anagrammed: Replace that word with its opposite, written in the same way (so that the piece in front of Michelangelo doesn't change). Then take the piece to the right of Michelangelo and shift it one space back in the alphabet.

Raphael:

You see something that really doesn't belong on pizza, and it ends on the slice in front of you: Gross! Change its last letter so that it becomes something much tastier. Also, it looks like there's only one Roman numeral on the whole pizza. Divide it by 10, just to be safe.

You see a character who shares your favorite color and attitude: Dude! You want to write the name of the green character from the same film, but you don't want to write over seven different slices. Just write the middle three letters over the three slices closest to you, in the same direction as the original name. Then, on a whim, look at the two slices after this name would have ended, and replace them with the first and last letters of your favorite color.

Michelangelo:

It's time to begin: Alright, it's time for some lu

5. Charlie created as many compounds as her two neighbors combined.

6. The set of chemists with workbenches to the left of Desmond is exactly the set of chemists whose names come before his alphabetically.

7. Fantine thought it was pretty cool that the number of compounds she created was the average of the numbers created by her neighbors, until Gustavo pointed out that the same applied to him.

! Gather your brothers around the table, with Leonardo to your left and Raphael to your right. Cut the pizza into twelve sectors so that there's one sector in front of each of you, and two sectors in between each pair of adjacent turtles around the table. Then sign your masterpiece: write your name (in ketchup), one letter per slice, starting with the piece in front of you and proceeding clockwise. Explain to everyone that words in later steps can be read either clockwise or counterclockwise.

Everyone else has completed their tasks: Cowabunga! Eat the three pieces in front of you.

Oops! The letters on those pieces imply they were meant for one of your brothers. Try to remember the second, third, and first letters that he wrote early on in the puzzle. Find those letters on the pizza, and replace them with the first, second, and third letters (respectively) of the word you just ate. There, now we should be done.

Donatello:

You see the last name of a movie star, centered on the slice in front of you: He doesn't play one of the nerdier characters in his film fra

fries. Anyway, blue-shift all of the letters in ROYGBIV.

You see a description of this type of puzzle, from your piece to Michelangelo's, but anagrammed: Replace that word with its opposite, written in the same way (so that the piece in front of Michelangelo doesn't change). Then take the piece to the right of Michelangelo and shift it one space back in the alphabet.

Raphael:

You see something that really doesn't belong on pizza, and it ends on the slice in front of you: Gross! Change its last letter so that it becomes something much tastier. Also, it looks like there's only one Roman numeral on the whole pizza. Divide it by 10, just to be safe.

You see a character who shares your favorite color and attitude: Dude! You want to write the name of the green character from the same film, but you don't want to write over seven different slices. Just write the middle three letters over the three slices closest to you, in the same direction as the original name. Then, on a whim, look at the two slices after this name would have ended, and replace them with the first and last letters of your favorite color.

Michelangelo:

It's time to begin: Alright, it's time for some lu

! Gather your brothers around the table, with Leonardo to your left and Raphael to your right. Cut the pizza into twelve sectors so that there's one sector in front of each of you, and two sectors in between each pair of adjacent turtles around the table. Then sign your masterpiece: write your name (in ketchup), one letter per slice, starting with the piece in front of you and proceeding clockwise. Explain to everyone that words in later steps can be read either clockwise or counterclockwise.

Everyone else has completed their tasks: Cowabunga! Eat the three pieces in front of you.

Oops! The letters on those pieces imply they were meant for one of your brothers. Try to remember the second, third, and first letters that he wrote early on in the puzzle. Find those letters on the pizza, and replace them with the first, second, and third letters (respectively) of the word you just ate. There, now we should be done.

Donatello:

You see the last name of a movie star, centered on the slice in front of you: He doesn't play one of the nerdier characters in his film fra

You see a character who shares your favorite color and attitude: Dude! You want to write the name of the green character from the same film, but you don't want to write over seven different slices. Just write the middle three letters over the three slices closest to you, in the same direction as the original name. Then, on a whim, look at the two slices after this name would have ended, and replace them with the first and last letters of your favorite color.

Michelangelo:

It's time to begin: Alright, it's time for some lu

gerous chemicals.

5. Charlie created as many compounds as her two neighbors combined.

6. The set of chemists with workbenches to the left of Desmond is exactly the set of chemists whose names come before his alphabetically.

7. Fantine thought it was pretty cool that the number of compounds she created was the average of the numbers created by her neighbors, until Gustavo pointed out that the same applied to him.

! Gather your brothers around the table, with Leonardo to your left and Raphael to your right. Cut the pizza into twelve sectors so that there's one sector in front of each of you, and two sectors in between each pair of adjacent turtles around the table. Then sign your masterpiece: write your name (in ketchup), one letter per slice, starting with the piece in front of you and proceeding clockwise. Explain to everyone that words in later steps can be read either clockwise or counterclockwise.

Everyone else has completed their tasks: Cowabunga! Eat the three pieces in front of you.

Oops! The letters on those pieces imply they were meant for one of your brothers. Try to remember the second, third, and first letters that he wrote early on in the puzzle. Find those letters on the pizza, and replace them with the first, second, and third letters (respectively) of the word you just ate. There, now we should be done.

Donatello:

You see the last name of a movie star, centered on the slice in front of you: He doesn't play one of the nerdier characters in his film fra

1. The seven chemists (including Ernesto) had workbenches in one long row.
2. Each chemist created a different number of compounds, from one to seven.
3. Allison and Fantine created a total of five compounds.

gerous chemicals.

5. Charlie created as many compounds as her two neighbors combined.

6. The set of chemists with workbenches to the left of Desmond is exactly the set of chemists whose names come before his alphabetically.

7. Fantine thought it was pretty cool that the number of compounds she created was the average of the numbers created by her neighbors, until Gustavo pointed out that the same applied to him.

1. The seven chemists (including Ernesto) had workbenches in one long row.
2. Each chemist created a different number of compounds, from one to seven.
3. Allison and Fantine created a total of five compounds.
4. Bren

ise, but you're still a huge fan. Replace his last name with his first name, but written backwards.

You see an SI base unit: Replace it with a non-SI unit of area that's the same number of letters. Hey, the piece in front of Raphael didn't change!
